Creating the Human Past: An Epistemology of Pleistocene Archaeology

Robert G. Bednarik
CONTENTS

Introduction 1

Preamble
- Generic problems
- When archaeology turns feral
- The unsatisfactory state of the discipline

Versions of archaeology 17
- Theories of archaeology
  - Traditional notions
  - The 'New Archaeology'
  - Postprocessual archaeology
  - Postmodernism in archaeology
- Regionalism in archaeology
- Subject specialisation in archaeology

Neocolonialism in archaeology 35
- Political dimensions of archaeology
- Archaeology’s curatorial ambitions
- Archaeology and ‘the other’
- Neo-colonialist effects of contemporary archaeology

Milestones of Pleistocene archaeology 53
- Heretics in Pleistocene archaeology
- The discovery of humanity’s great antiquity
- The discovery of fossil man
- The discovery of Pleistocene art
- The discovery of Homo erectus
- The discovery of Australopithecus
- Modern heretics in archaeology

Mistakes in archaeology 71
- Piltdown man
- The trouble with Glozel
- The hot waters of the Côa
- The Jinmium blues
- ‘African Eve’: a gene fetish
- The Hobbit myth
- Conclusions

Logic in archaeology 101
- Introduction
- The role of taphonomy
Metamorphology: an alternative
Why the dominant paradigm is wrong

A metamorphology of archaeology
The collection of archaeological data
A review of archaeological interpretation
Biases of dissemination
The blowtorch of logic
Return to Eve

Contingencies in Pleistocene archaeology
Frameworks
Social realities
Towards an epistemology of Pleistocene archaeology

Taxonomies in archaeology
Prelude to a summary
‘Taxonomisation’ in archaeology
Summarising

Index